ONION IS LILY'S "POOR RELATION"

(Ohio State Journal)

Out in our garden grows the humble but useful onion, the poor relation of the lovely and dignified lily. We are ashamed to say that also in our garden grows the humble chickweed and we have even rooted out a few lengths of the pestiferous purslane.

Do the spiky garden pings and the gorgeous hothouse carnations look down upon their poor relations, the chickweeds? And are the gentle little spring beauty and the portulaca which gird in grandmother's garden ashamed of their poor relation, the pestiferous purslane? If the much esteemed lettuce despises the humbler member of his family we heartily join with him, for it is no other than the ever present dandelion.

Carrots and parsnips and parsley are worse than just poor folks, as they have had traditions running through and through their family; their poor relations are criminals—poison hemlock, wild carrot, monkshood. However, we forgive this family its bad record for it gives us one grand member, celery. Does the tomato remember the time and not so long ago when it too, was considered poisonous and does it now draw aside from the deadly nightshade and the jimson who, with the potato, is its near relative?

In the plant world as in our own, or in other animate life, these mixed relationships of good and bad are endless, and we can only hope that some day there will be no black sheep in any family and that we shall be like the rose family, which gives us mellow-sweet, raspberries, blackberries, strawberries and roses.
